

The programs given by the Federated Community Association last week were very well attended, and the concensus of opinion seems to be that the entertainments as a whole were very satisfactory, though nearly all agree a weak spot appeared now and then. But that's to be expected—you can't please all the people all the time. The violin selections by Miss Ekholm and the readings by Miss Zimmerman were particularly pleasing. The motive back of these entertainments, that of fostering a better community understanding and co-operation, is the one aim of the local guarantors. The Federated Community association have it in their power to aid this movement by furnishing us with high class talent. Binford is not displeased over our first number of this season's series, nor with those of previous years, but our neighboring newspapers have given out poor reports of one of the companies appearing in their towns this winter, and it is hoped that the association will take action to improve this condition before very long.
