

The house occupied by W. J. Dalton, burned to the ground Tuesday morning. Mr. Dalton arose at his usual hour, made a fire in the stove, and went to the depot to attend to his work there. After a short time he chanced to look out the window, and saw the house in flames, but the fire had gained such headway, nothing could be saved, and all furniture and clothing were destroyed. The loss of the furniture was partly covered by insurance.
