

White Bread Comes Back.

Gone with the other dark things of war is dark bread, according to word received last Thursday by Co. Food Administrator L. P. Larson, from Federal Food Administrator Ladd.

Immediate abandonment of the 80-20 substitute plan was announced in the message and henceforth white bread will occupy its old post as the staff of life, without its eaters being accused of disloyalty.

Although wheat bread may now appear on the American table without restriction, the food administration announced it will continue to advocate conservation in the use of flour.

Substitutes already purchased and for which millers, dealers or bakers do not find a ready sale will be purchased by the grain corporation of the food administration under plans now being formulated. The coarser grains used as substitutes will be placed on the market as animal feeds, of which there is a shortage.

It has been pointed out that the Mediterranean sea is now safe for commercial transport and that the European nations can draw again on the large wheat supplies of India and Australia. With cargo ships released from military service it will be possible to tap accumulated supplies in the Argentine.
