

ing establishment, and thought it advisable to make the most of his chance.

Mr. Ness, during his long period of work and association with the publisher of the Enterprise proved himself a diligent worker, and was willing to do mechanical, editorial or soliciting work, and devoted his undivided time and attention to whatever task was uppermost. He was a steady and efficient worker, and his work will be greatly missed in this office.

He has the best wishes of the Enterprise for his success in his new field of labor, and we have no doubt but that he will make good and earn rapid promotion with the larger firm with which he is now connected.
