

New Ford Story.

Anton Neu, a farmer living near De Smet, S. D., bought a small automobile of a widely known make—trained his flivver to catch skunks, and in a few weeks he has sold enough furs to almost pay for the car.

Neu believes his idea is original, but he has not patented it. As he drives along a highway, he examines culverts and when the presence of a skunk is evident, Neu gets busy. A hose is attached to the exhaust pipe of his car and inserted into the culvert.

"After the old boat runs a few minutes, any skunk in Christendom is ready to cry kamerad," Neu explained.

Neu's son recently disposed of one lot of furs containigg 16 skunks, for $200, the father said.
