Mrs. Otto Pritz sustained some very painful burns on her hands and forearms and face while washing a woolen dress in gasoline. She had just finished rubbing the cuffs and was lifting the dress up for rinsing when an explosion occurred, due undoubtedly, to static electricity, caused by the friction of rubbing. Fortunately, Mr. Pritz was home and became alarmed by the explosion. He rushed to her assistance and threw the vessel containing the gasoline into the snow. The glass in the door was shattered.
