

ates a little.

A regular blizzard—like the old-timers tell about—began yesterday morning and from all appearances its fury is not likely to abate for at least another day. Yesterdays train was on time but if the storm continues through the night it is very probable that we will have no train service on the branch today, or at any rate it will be several hours late. The rural carriers attempted to make their trips over the routes but were forced to turn back after a short distance.
