

The Northern Pacific supply train made a trip up the branch last week. This is a new plan recently put into operation by the company, and is in the interests of economy and conservation. The train picks up all the broken and discarded equipment of all kinds at all stations along the line; things that otherwise would be lost or entirely wasted, and ships them to the shops where they can be repaired or worked up into new material. On this initial trip a number of the officials were along to check up the venture in order to see whether or not the plan will prove practical.
