

Hannaford Enterprise: A marshal even as small a town as Hannaford usually has a variety of experiences during the course of a year, but a new one fell to the lot of Marshal David Palm last week when he had to play host to a couple of Indian boys. It seems that Indian boys are taken away from their parents at a rather tender age, and sent to one or the other of the several Indian schools in the state. Naturally some of these boys get homesick even though they have much better food and care than they are accustomed to at home, and if opportunity offers, some of the most daring ones will run away. This had been the case of these two boys at the Wahpeton school. The youngsters, about 8 and 12 years old, had succeeded in boarding a train at night, in Wahpeton, and had traveled with a bunch of boes till they got as far as Hannaford. Word had been sent out from the institution for their apprehension, and when they reached here they were taken into custody. They remained here in the care of David Palm for two or three days, until an attendant from Wahpeton arrived to take them back to the school. Evidently they enjoyed the stay in Hannaford and it was with the keenest regret that they took their departure for Wahpeton.
