

Every indication points to a monster crowd at the Old-Time dance tomorrow evening. Many of the old-timers who have not been on the floor for many years are growing impatient in anticipation of the event, and The Times has it on good authority that some of them are utilizing their spare moments in familiarizing themselves with the old steps. Of course they have been doing this on the sly, but in one case, at least, his better half caught him in the act and reprimanded him. The situation became embarrassing for a time, but when she was informed that "he didn't propose to go to that dance and sit around," she acquiesced and urged him to continue the performance, to her delight. Needless to say they're both going to be there. So a word for the music. The town members of the orchestra—Olaf Krogfoss, Oscar Arneson and Vol Craft, have been holding secret meetings practicing up for the occasion. Snatches from their whispered conversations while, in public leads us to believe that they have a surprise to spring on us. All in all, tomorrow night's event promises to be an important one in the dance annals in this man's town. It will be a regular fountain of youth—and not a mistake.
