

Our jail was virtually dedicated Monday evening, and the exercises were quite interesting. A couple of fellows, having grown bold from the privilege allowed them before the village was incorporated, got some booze and sat on the street drinking it and having a good time generally. They having refused to discontinue these proceedings, Officer Amundson was summoned and took them in charge, placing them in the village bastille. After they had sobered up sufficiently they were willing to appear in Justice Pritz, court to answer to the charge and plead guilty, whereupon they were fined and released. This is the first step toward good government, and should be a warning to those who are accustomed to conducting themselves in this manner, for the law must and will be enforced and there is no great amount of leniency in store for violators of the law.
