

Henry Alfson met with an accident Tuesday that will compel him to give up any active farming operations on his part for this spring, at least. He was using a steam engine to do his plowing, and was going to fill his engine with water and in stepping from the engine to the water tank, the hose he was carrying caught on something causing him to lose his balance, falling with his whole weight across the wheel, sustaining severe internal injuries. He is able to be around but has to be mighty careful in his movements.
