

Benjamin Ford walked down town yesterday morning to get shaved, which is a most remarkable incident inasmuch as Mr. Ford was only a short time ago in a very serious condition as a result of an attack of lock-jaw. This disease as a rule proves fatal, but there are a few exceptions to the rule, the rate of recoveries being about one out of fourteen cases, provided the best of medical aid is procured. Mr. Ford's recovery is due to the excellent qualifications of Dr. J. R. Truscott, who has worked hard on the case and watched its every development with a keen interest and knowledge that have been instrumental in bringing about the doctor's enviable success in the large practice he has built up in this vicinity. The idea of a man having lock-jaw, and getting cured is a remarkable thing, and Mr. Ford's friends have occasion for great rejoicing at the happy outcome of his serious case.
