Editor Lowden doubtless has more sympathy for the railroad men now than any other editor in North Dakota. He came here Friday with a bunch of shovelers from his town and Mose, and went out with them to meet the train below here. When they returned he was still with them, and he went out Saturday on the road between here and his town and shoveled snow all day, and in some way he missed the rest of his crowd when they departed for home. As a consequence he remained with the crew all day Sunday and Monday until he got the train through to McHenry Tuesday noon. His hands are covered with blisters and his back is warped out of shape, he is a trifle knee sprung and his face looks haggard and worn but he certainly did his share to help the train through to his town and he worked like a slave all the time. The people of his town no doubt appreciate the fact that the train finally got there with coal and some provision, but they should in addition to that give Mr. Lowden a great deal of credit for his valuable aid in bringing about this happy condition.
