

Sam Bjornson had a tussle with some horses this morning that might have resulted seriously, but luckily escaped with a few minor bruises. He was driving one team and leading another, and when they approached one of the elevators, they became frightened, supposedly from the grain running in the spouts, and broke away, jerking him to the ground, and in the mixup he was scratched in the face and one horse stepped on his chest. He washed up the wounds and went right to work, feeling thankful that it was no worse.