

The Iverson boys, west of town, have some patches of strawberries on their farms that are certainly great and bears out the assertion that that fruit can be raised with success in North Dakota. Louis Iverson brought in a crate to Larson, Ringlee & Co. last Saturday and they sold like hot cakes. The Times family was the recipient of a box of them, and they were as good as any we have eaten. The berries are large and luscious and certainly speaks well for this as a fruit growing country. Every farmer should have a patch on his farm.
