

Early Monday morning, near Kindred station, Engineer Walter Jinks met a horrible death. Engineer Jinks was on the snow plow, and had stopped near the station to make some repairs under his engine. He sent a brakeman back to flag an approaching freight train, but owing to the severe storm, did not catch the signal and bumped into the plow, crushing the life out of the brave engineer. Mr. Jinks was up here the day before, Sunday last, clearing the track and brought up those cars of merchandise from Colgate.
