When the train for Hope reached Page Thursday evening there were a number of farmers gathered there awaiting the arrival of coal, the local dealers having exhausted their supply some days before. There were several cars of coal attached to the train but they were all billed for Hope. When this fact became known there was considerable excitement among the seekers after fuel and threats were both loud and deep as to what would be done if a supply was not left. The railroad officials took the right view of the case and switched off one of the cars of coal, making everybody happy.
