

Died of Glanders

Orlan D. Barlow, a Great Northern brakeman, died at Minot following a very brief illness, of what is pronounced glanders.

It was about ten days ago that he became inoculated by getting some of the poisonous matter into a wound in his hand from a horse that had the disease.

It was not until a couple of days before his death that the attending physicians discovered what was really the matter with him, but from that time on every thing has been done that is known to medical science to save his life, but in vain, and Saturday night death claimed him for a victim.
