

While digging in his potato patch Monday Martin Wold ran his fork into a human skull and for a few moments was so overcome at the discovery of this grewsome relic that he was threatened with heart failure. Just how this skull came to be in the garden is one of the unexplained mysteries and one that will probably never be unraveled. In the early years the old Dakota House was known as a tough place and many brawls took place within its walls, whether this skull is part of the remains of one of the victims of a brawl or whether it is part of the remains of a man or woman who had been buried on the lot will never be known, but we are inclined to think it to be latter. It is a peculiar find anyway and Mr. Wold would like to know how the skull got into his potato patch.
