

With between thirty and forty million bushels of wheat buried under snow and ice a foot deep in western Canada, the question naturally arises as to whether that country after all is the equal of the United States as a home for the growing of grain—Climatic conditions taken as the basis for comparison. It is true that the homestead laws of Canada are modeled along entirely different lines from those of the United States, and by far more favorable to homeseekers, with the result that thousands of American farmers have become Canadians by adoption at least, but even under the most favorable conditions it is a question if they are not losers in the long run by their migration.—Hagerman Valley Sun.
