

Dr. Winsloe and T. Cardin who were reported lost in the storm last Thursday night, turned up at the farm of John M. Johnson west of town, all right. Johnson had no phone and the storm was so bad that it was impossible to reach a place where there was a phone until the storm died down. In the meantime the families of these two worthies were pretty well worried as well as the entire community who thought they had perished in the storm. They left Steinborn's about 10:30 Thursday night and started for home and stopped at Johnson's who advised them to remain all night. The boys thought they could make it all right if Johnson would put them on the right road which he did, and they started out. They wandered around on one section for about two hours and by the merest good luck caught a glimpse of the light. Mr. Johnson left burning in the window and finally wound up at the Johnson farm again. It is needless to say that they were mighty glad to accept the hospitality extended by Mr. Johnson and remained all night and all the day after.
