It looks as if the snow had come to stay. But we hope not as it is unusually early, and to the farmer whose grain is yet unthreshed it would be a serious thing as well as to merchants and to other business man. But such is life in the "wild and wooly west" and as the North Pole seems to be drifting nearer to us each year, we would suggest that each farmer buy his own threshing outfit another season; and to those not able to do so we would advise them to sell their seed, if they happen to be so fortunate as to have any, and buy flour and provisions for the year. This is the surest advice we can furnish to the farmers.

To the merchant we would say quit the business and go to help fight the Indians the government ought to be surer pay than his (the merchant's) customers as it takes two thirds of a farmer's profit each year to pay taxes. And to the ministers we would advise them all to become editors. The Revs. White and Grimmer's success must be encouraging to others.
