

J. L. Rapp returned the latter part of last week from Mountain Home, Idaho, where he had spent about a week looking after his property interests. He was somewhat disappointed when he discovered that he had lost his homestead owing to the fact that he had been lead to believe it was not necessary for him to live on it inasmuch as he had other property in the state. He has also lost his right to file again, which he considers a greater loss than the homestead.