Martin Falk Jr. and brother, Peter Falk, went down to Jamestown last night, being fortunate enough to be admitted on the crowded train. The former took his little eight year old daughter down to the City Hospital to take treatment for an injured knee which has baffled the skill of physicians to effect a recovery. The injury dates back to about three weeks ago, when, while playing with some of her playmates, she fell from a window sill and injured her kneecap. Very little attention was given at first, it being considered of little consequence until the child began to complain of severe pains which grew constantly worse and it was concluded best to take her to the hospital where adequate rest and attention could be given to the injured member.
