

R. H. Reid states that some youthful marauders have destroyed a good deal of his property on the buildings located on his farm west of town. Windows have been broken and other acts of mischief perpetrated by the youthful offenders, and he says his patience is about ready to give out. The boys are known to him, Mr. Reid states, and unless they cease the destruction of valuable property he will prosecute the offenders to the full extent of the law. The parents of the youngsters are asked to stop the depredations and thus save their children a lot of unnecessary trouble which is bound to ensue if the mischief is continued. A word of warning should be sufficient. The wilful destruction of property is punishable by law with a heavy fine or jail sentence.
