

An accident occurred to T. J. Welsh and family last Monday which easily might have proved fatal. Just as he was ready to return from a trip to the north in the neighborhood of the new line of the Great Northern railroad his team ran away with his two little daughters in the buggy. Mr. Welsh grasped the line on one of the horses and held on to them for a while but after throwing him to the ground two or three times they broke away. One of the children in the act of climbing over the seat of the buggy was thrown to the ground but miraculously escaped without any injuries. The younger child remained in the rig until the horses were caught by Mr. Welsh, the runaways having circled around which enabled him to catch them.
