

Albert Rooth was the victim of a serious accident on Thanksgiving afternoon. Mr. Rooth had just purchased Gile Berg's automobile and was giving some of his friends a ride when the accident happened. In the afternoon he had been out to Wm. Van Scoik's place, and there were seven men in the machine when he attempted to turn the corner by W. D. Sinclair's residence while going at too high a rate of speed with the result that the machine was over-turned. All the men with the exception of Mr. Rooth fell clear of the car and only David Palm was somewhat battered and had his face badly bruised. Mr. Rooth clung persistently to the steering wheel and was pinned under the machine. He was taken to W. H. Richardson's residence, and Dr. Benson called. It was found that six ribs were broken,
