One of the school busses loaded with children had a very close call at the railroad crossing in town one day last week. A fast special train which was approaching, was not observed until the team was on the track. Ray Ackerman chanced to be near enough to catch the horses and turn them off just as the train passed. The law requires drivers of school busses to come to a full stop before crossing a railroad track and make sure there is no moving train near. Some day this ruling will be unheeded once too often and then the inevitable tragedy will occur.
