

For several yerrs Ludvig Hareland has noticed a small mound in his pasture, and has taken it for a pile of dirt thrown up by a badger, but diggiug in it this week discovered a human skeleton. He removed only a few of the bones, and has left the place for the time being just as it was, but intends to fence it in, and have the spot marked as of historical interest. There might be a possibility that it is the grave of a Sibley expedition soldier, or that of a camp follower, but it is more probable that it is an old Indian grave. It would be interesting to have a competent student of such matters examine the grave and its contents in detail, and this will probably be done.—Hannaford Enterprise.
