

Oscar Kjelson gave the editor of this paper some samples of his crab apples which he raised this year. They were beauties of the Transcendant variety and of remarkably fine flavor. Ordinarily crabs are not much to our liking, but these are as near regular fruit as one could wish. The main reason for his success in raising this fruit is because the trees are well protected by windbreaks.