

Quite a lively runaway occurred one evening this week at the Jones elevator, when his best double teams of horses became frightened at a switch train and started on the run. The team was standing in the elevator with a load of grain which was being dumped into the pit when the train came along and without a moments warning the team leaped forward out of the elevator and started east. Soon after leaving the elevator one of the horses fell and was dragged quite a distance before finally gaining its feet, when the harness gave way. The horse was considerably bruised, but was pressed into service the next day feeling none the worse for its experience. The team ran quite a distance and stopped at the barn in Mr. Jones yard.
