

W. H. Tomlinson returned Friday morning from Big Sandy, Mont., where he filed on one of the homesteads offered by the government. He reports the Missouri river as on a rampage and states that at one place the railroad track was completely covered by water for a considerable distance, and that one of the towns along the line looked more like a lake than a place inhabited by human beings.