

Frank Paulson's farm house was badly damaged by fire last Thursday. The Mortenson Bros., who are renting the farm, were out in the field husking corn when they observed smoke pouring out of the house. The boys immediately got on the job as firemen, and as luck would have it there was a water tank full of water at the barn, and some swift and efficient work was done carrying water to the burning building. That they succeeded in getting the fire out after it had gained such headway testifies to prompt work. The fire evidently started from the stove. The loss is partly covered by insurance.
