Extravagance in Living.

In Harper's Magazine such crimes as those of Ferdinand Ward, while they spring often from depravity, are oftener the result of mere weakness of character. Thackeray in many of his minor sketches constantly draws the portrait Croup. It never fails to give relief. One of the man and woman whose means are not equal to the style of living which they desire; and they desire it not for itself, but only because others have it. They are not strong and steady enough to be content with that which they can command and afford, and the means to secure the other must somehow be obtained. Thackeray puts the fact in the simplest and most amusing form. The young couple must give a dinner, and instead of the joint of lamb and the glass of beer which is the only repast to which they have the moral right to invite a friend—if, indeed, the beer may be morally permitted—they must needs pre-pare a feast which they can not honor-ably afford, and for the sole reason that other people who can afford it give such feasts.

It is this doing a little more, or a great deal more, than the doer can honestly afford, which leads to the swindles of Wall street. Living in a house too expensive for his means, maintaining it accordingly, dressing as his richer neighbors dress, doing in all things as they do—it is this weak com-pliance which is hidden in the fine houses, and drives to the park in the fine equipages, which presently ends in Ludlow Street Jail and hopeless disgrace. Yet it is the poorest kind of competition, because the little imitator might see even with his dull eyes that there must always be a few persons who can "do the thing" better than all the rest, and without feeling it. The bull-frog may swell until he bursts, but he can not rival the ox.

This is the tendency which all sensible people-and a great many otherwise sensible people are swept away by it-ought quietly to resist. The power of individual example is immense, but it is often underestimated by the indi-vidual. 'My vote is of no consequence, but, since you wish it, I will vote," said a man to his neighbor, and the right candidate was elected by a majority of one. The family which in the midst of a saturnalia of luxury and extravagance refuse to take part in it, and holds to a simple, moderate, temperate way, is diminishing the supply of Ferdinand Wards and Wall street panics.

Drinking in the Middle Ages.

We are of opinion that drinking had not in the middle ages reached anything like the disgusting extreme at which we find it in the latter part of the seventeenth and the whole part of the eighteenth centuries. Chaucer, it will be conceded, was an accurate painter of the contem-day. Stearns' loss, $1,500. porary manners. With the one excepporary manners. With the one excep-tion of Shakespeare no Englishman has annoying kidney and urinary diseases. $1. surpassed him. Many of the characters in the "Canterbury Tales" get drunk, and misfortune happen to them in consequence, but nothing is ever said to indicate that the poet had any sympathy with this gross form of vice. The same may be said of the Elizabethan dramatists. It is not until! we reach the reign of Charles II. that we find writers of repute speaking of excess in drink as if it were no frailty, but rather a virtue. This distorted view of things continued getting worse and worse until the days of our grand fathers. All eighteenth century literature is full of it. There was a print once so popular that it was found on the walls of cottages, as well as in bar par-lors, which represented two compart-been appointed aide-de-camp to Gen. Stanley. ments. In each was a man sitting. The first was labeled "A Jolly Good Fellow." He had a tankard of foaming beer beside him. The other had for inscription "A Muck-worm," and represented a thin and careworn man making entries in a ledger. The inference to be drawn, of course, was that the man who cast up his accounts was infinitely inferior in the social scale to the boon companion who stupefied himself with where. beer. We imagine this was the common feeling of the time, and it continued in many classes down to the begin-ning of the present reign. We ourselves knew a farmer who had broken his ribs twice and an arm three times by falling off horseback when returning drunk from market.-The academy.

The Honest Countryman.

There is a cheap clothing dealer on Kearny, near California, whose confidence in mankind has received a severe setback. The other day an honest looking countryman walked into his store and said:

"You remember that second-hand overcoat I bought here for $8 yesterday ?"

"Never dakes pack anythings ven vonce solt, my frent," said the hand-medowner.

"Oh! that's all right. I just wanted to say that I found this $500 bill sewed in the lining. Perhaps the owner may call for it."

"Of gorse he vill—he has call already my tear frent," exclaimed the dealer, eagerly capturing the money, "You ish von honish man. Here, Here, I gif you feefty tollar ash a revard. Dot vill pe all right." When the honest customer got around the corner he murmured softly: guess I'd better take this fifty and skip up to Portland before that Sheeney tumbles to that counterfeit. It's getting mighty hard to shove the 'queer' round these parts, and that's a fact."-San Francisco Post.
